LETTER FROM LONDON. London, Sept. 5.-My first letter was about 3 o'clock Saturday morning, and we did. The stopping of the engines of the steamer caused me to awake (I had become so accustomed to their sound), and I dressed and went on deck, out I got there only in time to see the lighter (a small paddle-wheel steamer) move off with the mails and most of the steerage passengers who had come across with us. The shores and many of the hills of Ireland could be distinctly seen. The Umbria immediately proceeded toward Liverpool, and I returned to my stateroom, went to sleep and was awakened by the bugle call for breakfast, about 8 o'clock. An hour later the wind began to blow "great guns," raising a high sea, and the steamer rolled and pitched fearfully. Occasionally the spray would fly in sheets over the forecastle and down as far as the ralloon entrances. Walking was out held the question save when one had hold the question save when one had hold of a railing, rope or something else. The huge ship was kept listed to the starboard, and at times it would seem as though she would never "right" when a heavy flaw would send her so far down. This kept up all through 3t. George's Channel, and when the ship's course was changed at Holyhead it apparently afforded no relief, although the wind was striking us at the stern instead of on the port side as was the case previously. The waves were running very high, and during our passage through the Irish Sea we were thoroughly shaken up. We lost sight of Ireland about 10 o'clock and ran close to the Welsh coast on our right and the high cliffs were brought prominently into view. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon Brighton, Birkenhead, Waterloo and Liverpool began to loom up, and by 5 o'clock the steamer was off the landing stage waiting for the Campania to move our.

ticket on the Lucania, which leaves on the 18th for New York. I had experienced some apprehension concerning it, as the saloon berths are generally hard to secure at this season of the year, when so many persons are going home. The purser had told me that one of the agents would be at the pier to meet the steamer and I had better see him as quickly as possible. The agent was there—Mr. Moberly, a polite and pol
